

Wood Fence

When custom building a wood fence, there are many options available to you. First you may choose generally from two types of wood. Currently we are using either treated southern yellow pine or untreated western red cedar.

The wood offered by Allegheny Fence is typically of better quality than you can purchase from the home stores. Also, when custom building a fence, you have more flexibility than you do with pre-built panels. The panels are unable to follow the contour of the landscape that is so often seen in our area.

Construction begins with all posts (typically 4x4) being set in solid concrete footers. The rails (typically 2x4) are then attached, followed by each individual picket. This process allows flexibility for landscape changes.

The southern yellow pine is treated with the ACQ process to resist decay from insects. Water repellent can be applied periodically to treat your fence to keep it looking its best.

The western red cedar is not treated for insects or water. It is, however, naturally resistant to decay. When building a cedar fence, we recommend using “treated” posts to provided the extra decay protection as the posts are in the ground.

Both types of material can be used to build a variety of fence styles, from 3’ high picket to 6’ high solid or board on board to custom specifications requested by our customers. Accessories are available that include post finials and a variety of gate hardware. We can also cut the tops of the fence pickets and posts into gothic, french gothic, colonial, dog ear or flat designs. A scalloped fence is also popular.

Also available are post and rail fences, constructed using locust posts and hemlock rails, white or red cedar. These types of wood also have natural properties that are resistant to decay. Post and rail fences can also be constructed using treated material. This style of fence can be used decoratively, or as a barrier with attached welded or chain link fence wire.

For those who like something less traditional, we also have access, via special order, to high end decorative panels. These styles are sure to add unique style to your property.
